

Andrew Cowell is Professor of Linguistics and Director of the Center for Native American and Indigenous Studies at CU-Boulder. Much of his work focuses on documenting endangered Native American languages, with this endangerment being a result of language contact. He also recently completed an ethnography of language contact and language shift among the Northern Arapaho tribe of Wyoming, entitled "Naming the World: Language and Power among the Northern Arapaho" (U. of Arizona Press). Another past article compared language contact phenomena in Native America and Hawaii, examining why revitalization of Hawaiian has so far been more successful than for Native American languages. He has also written on medieval European language, culture, rhetoric and literature, and the relationship between Latin and vernacular languages in that setting.